

THE FISHERIES SECTOR: FROM CATCH TO CONSUMER

PART 4 OF A FIVE-PART SERIES

14th September, 2026

Exploring Opportunities Across the Fisheries Value Chain

RECAP

In part 3, we examined how proper handling, processing and packaging preserve fish quality, improve food safety, reduce post-harvest losses and create higher-value products.

Part 4 explores the phase that connects fish products to profitable markets.

Transport, Distribution and Marketing

Fish creates economic value only when it reaches consumers in good condition, at the right time and at an affordable price. In the fisheries value chain, transport, distribution and marketing provide the means to connect fishers, fish farmers and processors with households, retailers, restaurants, hotels, institutions and export markets. This phase requires professionals who will provide proper storage, ensure hygiene, keep good documentation, provide efficient transport and marketing services.

Business Opportunities

-  Cold-chain services - Ice production, insulated containers, refrigerated transport.
-  Fish aggregation and wholesale - Collecting products from fishers, farms and processors and supplying retailers, institutions and hospitality businesses.
-  Retail and mobile vending - Operating hygienic fish shops, market stalls, mobile delivery services.
-  Digital fish marketing - Using websites, mobile applications, social media and electronic payment systems to connect producers directly with customers.
-  Branding and market services - Providing product photography, labelling, packaging design, advertising and customer-research services.
-  Traceability and quality assurance - Developing recordkeeping, product-tracking, certification and food-safety support for fish businesses.
-  Export and regional trade services - Supporting documentation, standards compliance, freight forwarding and access to regional and international markets.
